Read the following passage and then answer question 26-38.

The main thrust of the 2010 constitution was devolution. Kenyans hoped for more development, participation and equality. For this reason, the constitution was heralded as the birth of a new generation of development and prosperity.

While devolution continues to gather pace amidst challenges and setbacks, dark clouds hang low in the health sector. Health workers are jittery over devolution of health. There is an eerie feeling that the train of devolution already departed and there can be no turning back.

On the other hand the constitution is viewed by some as an ass. It is whipped to fulfil the aspirations of the people. It is not cast in stone-it is a creature of the state-and the same state has the power to fine tune it to the demands of the time.

There are reports unconfirmed that some governors and county administrators are waiting with glee to slice the pay of health care workers. In one county a new pay schedule with bizarre deductions has been published.

Until now, the Ministry of Health has kept workers in the dark over their place in a devolved system. There is need for a robust debate on health in this country. Indeed, one of the core visions of our forefathers was to fight disease, ignorance and poverty.

Health workers may be blamed for not coming out during the constitution making process and airing their opinions, the way teachers did. But it is worthwhile to look at the kind of conditions they operate under. Working hours are unregulated, if not unforgiving. They stare death in the face everyday of their lives. They have to improvise. There is dire shortage of equipment.

Read the passage below and answer questions 39-50.

In the kingdom of Natambu, there lived two tribes. For a long time, they fought for the possession of River Gata, which separated the two kingdoms. Then, the tribe of Kusa to the North and Nguyanzu to the South for many years shed each other's blood over the disagreement.

Both tribes claimed their ancestors lived there and its water protected against diseases and eternal enemies. Attempts to solve the dispute for the three decades ended in bloody life strife and loss of lives. Finding an appropriate way to end the struggle also troubled the king for many days after warrior from the Kusa tribe killed his only son. The king was Nguyanzu. His wife advised him to slaughter all the kusa men and women, young and old. But the king refused. "only fools fight with swords but the wise fight with the wisdom of their forefathers."

However the queen did not stop reminding him that he had lost his only son who would have taken over the throne in his old age and unless he avenged his murder, he would be regarded as a coward.

During the second week into king's reign a warrior from the rival tribe pierced through his son's heart killing him instantly during a fierce confrontation between the Kusa and the Nguyanzu warriors along the river banks. The son had gone to swim at the river. The queen went before king, cried and rolled her body over the floor in pain but the king was not moved.

Then he called his three hundred sorcerers and ordered them to give him an urgent solution "Let us crush one of our most dangerous pythons and pour the powder into the river. We will warn our people against drawing water from the river for the next two months let the Kusa drink the water and they will all die" the sorcerers proposed.

The king replied, "I am a king, a ruler and a leader, not a killer or a murderer." He was disappointed with the sorcerers and commanded them to leave the palace at once.

By sunrise, all the people were crowded along the embankments facing each other from the opposite sides. Kusa to the Eastern direction and the Nguyanzu to the West. They wondered about the king's intentions. Women cried in silence while children trembled terribly, with fear as men chatted anxiously in low tones.

When king appeared, everybody went silent, he stood in the middle of the bridge and said, "By the power of your ancestors and the magic of their miracles I command the water to open and swallow your enemies.

Then everyone including the children went into frenzy calling upon their ancestors to let the water swallow their rivals. After an hour of chanting and ranting several names of their ancestors nothing was forthcoming.
